A Flight Evaluation of a VTOL Jet Transport Under Visual and Simulated Instrument Conditions Curt A. Holzhauser,1972 A flight investigation was performed with the Dornier DO-31 VTOL to evaluate the performance, handling qualities, and operating characteristics that are considered to be important in the operation of a commercial VTOL transport in the terminal area. The DO-31, a 20,000 kilogram transport, has a mixed jet propulsion system; main engines with nozzles deflect from a cruise to a hover position, and vertical lift engines operated below 170 knots. This VTOL mode incorporates pitch and roll attitude and yaw rate stabilization. The tests concentrated on the transition, approach, and vertical landing. The mixed jet propulsion system provided a large usable performance envelope that enabled simulated IFR approaches to be made on 7 deg and 12 deg glide slopes. In these approaches management of thrust magnitude and direction was a primary problem, and some form of integrating the controls will be necessary. The handling qualities evaluation pointed out the need for additional research of define flight path criteria. The aircraft had satisfactory control and stability in hover out of ground effect. The recirculation effects in vertical landing were large below 15 meters.

A Reaction Attitude Control System for Jet VTOL Research Aircraft Frank A. Pauli,James R. Rogers,Tom G. Sharpe,Ames Research Center,United States. National Aeronautics and Space Administration,1970 A new dual reaction control system provides the means for flight research on the requirements for VTOL attitude control systems. There are two conflicting requirements for any control system used in flight research. One is flexibility and the other is safety. Maximum flexibility can best be achieved by an electrically driven control system, but this frequently degrades safety. Maximum safety is provided by a mechanical control system. But this type system is difficult to change or adjust. Pilots consider their safety is not endangered if it is possible to switch from an electrical drive system to a mechanical drive system in about 0.1 sec after an electrical failure. The new dual reaction control system satisfies this requirement with a fail safe air switching system that controls 8.5 lb-m/sec of 500° F air. The research control system is an electrical drive system. The air switching concept set the requirement for large reaction control nozzles to handle the required air flow without excessive losses. Large nozzles, however, require large driving torques, although some nozzle types have lower driving torque requirements than others. An experimental determination was made for several reaction nozzle concepts to find the type with the lowest torque requirement. An outside can-type was devised that had sufficiently low driving torques (290 in.-oz for 60 psig air using a 3 sq in. exit area) so that a low power and low weight servomotor could be used and still achieve high response. It was also found that additional lift could be developed by a variation in this type nozzle. The combination of concepts of a rapid switching valve and a low torque nozzle permit maximum flexibility in system design of reaction attitude control systems for jet VTOL research aircraft.--P. [i].
