Use of Multiple Launch Rocket System (MLRS) in Military Operations on Urbanized Terrain (MOUT). ,2002 The purpose of this review of doctrine is to provide a background to non-fire supporters about MLRS and its potential application in MOUT. This review relies heavily on the concepts and tactics, techniques and procedures (TTP) found in FM 6-60 and supporting ideas from FM 6-50. The review is not limited to the short section on MOUT in FM 6-60, but includes a summary of relevant background factors for maneuver commanders and planners to consider. It is not a comprehensive report on the overall use of MLRS. Other associated doctrinal issues, such as logistical demands, weapons maintenance, and training programs in MOUT are not addressed here. Each of those issues, however, remain vital and deserve the attention of future research efforts.

Defense Acquisition U S Government Accountability Office (G,U. S. Government Accountability Office (,2013-07 GAO and the German Federal Court of Audit examined the Army's Multiple Launch Rocket System (MLRS) Terminal Guidance Warhead (TGW) Program, focusing on the program's requirements, schedule, performance, and cost. GAO found that: (1) the Army selected a different missile system for full-scale development, but program executives and the MLRS TGW project office reported they might seek to continue the program into full-scale development; (2) there is a continuing requirement for a target-sensing anti-armor submunition at the MLRS TGW rocket range, and MLRS TGW will have advantages over other systems; (3) the MLRS rocket could deliver the Brilliant Anti-Armor Submunition, and the technical data from the MLRS TGW program would be sufficient to apply to other programs; and (4) GAO questioned the basis for proceeding with full-scale development of MLRS TGW because of funding constraints, the Army's selection of another system for use at longer ranges, and the sufficiency of technical data acquired. The Federal Court of Audit found that: (1) numerous German Army and Air Force weapon systems, including MLRS TGW, were designed to fight second-echelon armored forces; and (2) separate analyses concluded that an overlapping German national system in development was more cost-effective at most ranges than MLRS TGW.

Weapons Codevelopment U S Government Accountability Office (G,U. S. Government Accountability Office (,2013-06 GAO reviewed how the Army's Multiple Launch Rocket System (MLRS) Terminal Guidance Warhead (TGW) Program protects U.S. interests. GAO found that: (1) although the United States is to pay 40 percent of the MLRS TGW development cost and France, Germany, and the United Kingdom are each to pay 20 percent, the Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) limited the U.S. development work share under the prime contract to a maximum of 34 percent; (2) the development tasks assigned to the United States had a relative quality value of 22.8 percent of the total quality development work, lowest of the four participating countries; (3) if the Department of Defense (DOD) wants to apply MLRS TGW limited rights data to other weapons development programs, contractors may require payment of nonrecurring fees or recurring royalties for use of the data; (4) if the United States withdrew and the other partner nations decided to continue, the United States would be obligated to continue paying its share for 270 days; (5) the exchange rates and the economic baseline for the MLRS TGW development program are still valued using 1984 exchange rates, but in December 1990, the partner nations agreed to adjust the rates when the program enters the maturation or full-scale development stage, which is projected for 1993; (6) third-country transfer provisions that allow partner nations to transfer technical data without the approval of the United States or other partner nations may not adequately protect U.S. interests; and (7) the Microwave Millimeter Wave Monolithic Integrated Circuit (MIMIC), a separate U.S. development effort, could be affected by the MOU provision requiring the United States to transfer design and manufacturing technology to the partner countries, but project officials intend to require a waiver of those provisions before MIMIC is introduced.

In order to facilitate the assessment of this system, the Systems Management and production Laboratory at The University of Alabama in Huntsville Research Institute was tasked to conduct an in-depth analysis as to the life cycle health of the MLRS weapon system's component parts.

Research, Evaluation and Analysis of Design Changes to the MLRS Launcher and Carrier ,1999 The System Engineering and Production Directorate (SEPD). Research Development and Engineering Center (RDEC), U.S. Army Aviation and Missile Command (AMCOM) has an engineering support contract with the University of Alabama in Huntsville. The scope of the contract provides for activities in system engineering and manufacturing technology. The Industrial Operations Division (IOD), SEPD, RDEC, AMCOM has the mission and function of providing technical management and engineering analysis as they relate to design changes for AMCOM supported weapon systems. This management and analysis ensures that design changes are incorporated only after a systematic technical evaluation and review of the total cost of the change is conducted. The systems engineering analysis evaluates the long-term life cycle consequences of the change, to include impacts on the manufacturability, maintainability and supportability of the overall weapon system.

Atmospheric Model Development for MLRS. ,1998 This report is divided into 5 letter reports covering the required scope of work tasks. The first task was the determination of the frequency distribution of 2, 3, and 4 rn/sec wind speed at the surface, 199 and 1000 m elevation for 2 Korean stations (Tab;Tables IOS -1.1 and 1.2). Tables 108 - 1.3 to 1.5 display the conditions for the same thresholds for other climatic regimes, standardized here. We learn that the Korean stations have much weaker wind speeds than at these previous stations. The next letter report delineates the study of the wind direction turn angle from the surface to 300m 500, 1000, and 1500 m of elevation. Of special interest was the 300 m elevation. Table 108-2.1 illustrates the turn angle. The turn angle from zero to 45 degrees implies agreement with the Eknan Model of friction. It is not surprising, however, that Albrook in the tropics provides the highest frequency with almost 85 % of data in this range, Thule shows the smallest amount. This is caused that cold air advection leads to backing, while friction and warm air advection shows veering of the wind. Thus cold air advection is expected to be low in the tropics (Albrook), while it is highest at the polar station (Thule). Similar results can be found for the additional tabulations 108 - 2.3 to 2.11. In letter report # 3 the wind direction profile is presented which is associated with the exceedance level of the wind speed. It should be noticed that the exceedance levels in the heading of the Tables 108 - 3.1 - 3.4 are not exceedance levels for the wind direction but rather the associated mean profile direction for the wind speed profiles.

Microelectronic Spare and Repair Part Status Analysis for the Multiple Launch Rocket System (MLRS). ,1999 The IOD, SEPD, RDEC, AMCOM has the mission and function of providing microelectronic technology assessments, and producibility and supportability analyses for AMCOM systems. IOD evaluates the impacts of nonavailability of microelectronic spare and repair parts on the life cycle supportability of AMCOM systems. IOD required management and engineering support In performing microelectronic technology and availability assessments for the impact of nonavailability on the Multiple Launch Rocket System (MLRS). IOD provides supportability and producibility engineering support for MLRS primarily in the spare parts area. IOD also required management support for coordinating and insuring resolution of MLRS producibility and supportability problems. In order to facilitate the assessment of this system, the Systems Management and Production Laboratory at UAH was tasked to conduct an in-depth analysis as to the life cycle health of the MLRS weapon System's component parts.
