Oriental Or Delhi Sore (Classic Reprint) S. P. James,2018-11-25 Excerpt from Oriental or Delhi Sore So far as I could ascertain these cases were typical of the class of more advanced chronic fever cases attending the dispensaries of such places in the Punjab as I visited. It seemed unnecessary to carry out the operation of spleen puncture upon more than the above 28 cases, for from the absence of parasites resembling those of Delhi Sore in any of these cases, selected on account of their apparent resemblance to cases known to be caused by such parasites, it was reasonable to conclude that parasites resembling those of Delhi Sore do not occur as a cause of enlargement of the spleen in the Punjab. During a subsequent tour in Assam it was possible to carry out an investigation converse to that just described, viz, to ascertain whether parasites similar to those causing kala azar ever exist in Assam as a cause of local sores resembling Delhi Sores. Although I took every opportunity while in Assam of examining specimens from sores of all kinds, I obtained no evidence there either of the occurrence of sores resembling Delhi Sores or of the occurrence of parasites resembling those of kala azar as a cause of only local lesions.' Perceptions and Treatment of Cutaneous Leishmaniasis in Suriname ,2015 Cutaneous leishmaniasis is a parasitic skin infection, viewed by biomedical professionals as one of the most serious skin diseases in developing countries. It affects between 1 and 1.5 million people globally and is a growing health problem. The disease is caused by parasites that are transmitted via the bite of an infected sand fly. How do people in Suriname, where CL is common in the hinterland, perceive, explain and fight the disease? This study describes and analyses the complex health seeking trajectory of CL patients in Suriname from a medical-anthropological perspective. Using mainly qualitative methods, the author explores people's illness experiences and treatment decisions (self-medication, herbal traditional medicine, biomedical treatment). She argues that these should be understood from the view point of patients and their direct environment, within the larger historical, social, economic, and environmental contexts. She relates the stunning variety of medicines people use in self-medication with their uncertainty about the cause of the illness, their associative style of reasoning, and the specific context of their daily life. One of the most prominent and disfiguring characteristics of the disease is its extensive ulceration and scar formation from lesions. Cutaneous leishmaniasis is therefore often associated with stigma. The most striking conclusion of the study is that - unlike in some other countries - people with CL are, in general, not stigmatized in Suriname and do not feel inhibited to seek biomedical treatment because of shame.--Samenvatting auteur.

Molecular and Immune Mechanisms in the Pathogenesis of Cutaneous Leishmaniasis Felix J. Tapia,Gisela Cáceres-Dittmar,Martín A. Sánchez,1996

Control of the Leishmaniasis WHO Expert Committee on the Control of the Leishmaniasis. Meeting,World Health Organization,2010 This report makes recommendations on new therapeutic regimens for visceral and cutaneous leishmaniasis, on the use of rapid diagnostic tests, details on the management of Leishmania-HIV coinfection and consideration of social factors and climate change as risk factors for increased spread. Recommendations for research include the furtherance of epidemiological knowledge of the disease and clinical studies to address the lack of an evidence-based therapeutic regimen for cutaneous and mucocutaneous leishmaniasis and post-kala-azar dermal leishmaniasis (PKDL). This report not only provides clear guidance on implementation but should also raise awareness about the global burden of leishmaniasis and its neglect. It puts forward directions for formulation of national control programmes and elaborates the strategic approaches in the fight against the leishmaniasis. The committee's work reflects the latest scientific and other relevant developments in the field of leishmaniasis that can be considered by Member States when setting national programmes and making public health decisions.--P.
