Boundary-induced Downwash Due to Lift in a Two-dimensional Slotted Wind Tunnel S. Katzoff,Raymond L. Barger,1959
A solution has been obtained for the complete tunnel-interference flow for a lifting vortex in a two-dimensional slotted tunnel. Curves are presented for the longitudinal distribution of tunnel-induced down-wash angle for various values of the boundary openness parameter and for various heights of the vortex above the tunnel center line. Some quantitative discussion is given of the use of these results in calculating the tunnel interference for three-dimensional wings in rectangular tunnels with closed side walls and slotted top and bottom.

Slotted Underdrain Systems Thomas P. Courtney,1975

Wind Tunnel Evaluation of a Model Helicopter Main-Rotor Blade With Slotted Airfoils at the Tip ,2001 Data for rotors using unconventional airfoils are of interest to permit an evaluation of this technology's capability to meet the U.S. Army's need for increased helicopter mission effectiveness and improved safety and survivability. Thus, an experimental investigation was conducted in the Langley Transonic Dynamics Tunnel (TDT) to evaluate the effect of using slotted airfoils in the rotor blade tip region (85 to 100 percent radius) on rotor aerodynamic performance and loads. Four rotor configurations were tested in forward flight at advance ratios from 0.15 to 0.45 and in hover in-ground effect. The hover tip Mach number was 0.627, which is representative of a design point of 4000-ft geometric altitude and a temperature of 95 degrees F. The baseline rotor configuration had a conventional single element airfoil in the tip region. A second rotor configuration had a forward-slotted airfoil with a -6 degrees slat, a third configuration had a forward-slotted airfoil with a -10 degrees slat, and a fourth configuration had an aft-slotted airfoil with a 3 degrees flap (trailing edge down). The results of this investigation indicate that the -6 degrees slat configuration offers some performance and loads benefits over the other three configurations.

Wall Interference in Wind Tunnels with Slotted and Porous Boundaries at Subsonic Speeds Barrett Stone Baldwin,John B. Turner,Earl D. Knechtel,1953 Linearized compressible-flow analysis is applied to the study of wind-tunnel-wall interference for subsonic flow in either two-dimensional or circular test sections having slotted or porous walls. Expressions are developed for evaluating blockage and lift interference.

Experiments with Slotted Wings ,1921 The idea of increasing the lift of an aerofoil by subdividing it goes back to gliding flight experiments by the writer before the war. A crash in August, 1917, with a Rumpler C airplane, on account of stalling, caused the idea to be put into concrete form and presented for a patent in 1918. The patent claim reads: Supporting surface characterized by its being divided into a number of tandem components which together form a wing section. The application was at first rejected because the patent office did not believe in the possibility of increasing the lift by dividing the wing. The issuing patent was made dependent on conclusive proof of such increase.

Theoretical Study of the Tunnel-boundary Lift Interference Due to Slotted Walls in the Presence of the Trailing-vortex System of a Lifting Model Clarence W. Matthews,United States. National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics,1955

An Investigation of Several Slotted Wind Tunnel Wall Configurations with a High Disk Loading V/STOL Model Travis W. Binion,1971 The investigation reported herein is the experimental portion of a unified theoretical and experimental search for a slotted wind tunnel wall configuration with minimal interference for conventional and V/STOL models. It is shown that theory and experiment are in excellent agreement for the classical case provided an appropriate expression is used to relate the wall geometry to the boundary condition. Classical data correction equations are not appropriate for the V/STOL case, however. An additional term, not predicted by theory, is needed to account for changes in the jet wake. Geometric parameters which influence the wall interference quantities are indicated. Wall configurations are shown which will produce interference-free force data to a jet-to-free-stream velocity ratio of 4.5. (Author).

Lift and Drag Characteristics of a Low-drag Airfoil with Slotted Flap Submitted by Curtiss-Wright Corporation Ira H. Abbott,1941 A 24-inch chord wooden model equipped with a slotted flap (submitted by the Curtiss-Wright Corporation) was tested in the Langley two-dimensional tunnel. The model represented a wing section of the P-60A airplane and was of, or approximately of, the NACA 66,2-18 section. The model was equipped with a 0.25c slotted flap with the lip on the upper airfoil surface at approximately 90 percent of the airfoil chord. This flap deflected in such a manner as to keep the slot closed until a deflection was normally 30 degrees with an actual limit of 32.5 degrees set by the model construction. The model was equipped with pressure distribution orifices.

A Numerical Method of Calculating the Boundary-induced Interference in Slotted or Perforated Wind Tunnels of Rectangular Cross Section James D. Keller,Ray H. Wright,1971 A numerical method is presented for calculating the boundary-induced interference at subsonic speeds in wind tunnels of rectangular cross section with slotted or perforated walls. The slot width or wall porosity can vary throughout the test section. The interference can be computed at any point in the test section. The model can be any configuration and can be located anywhere in the test section. Several examples are given, and comparison is made with other methods were available.
